

From There: Some Thoughts on Poetry & Place

Literary Nonfiction. Poetry. In his 2015 Garnett Sedgewick lecture, award-winning poet and literary critic Stephen Burt discusses the relation of poetry to time, space and place. He examines the widespread and popular view of contemporary critics who claim that modern lyric poetry is supposed to have a speaking self who resides outside of space and time, and addresses readers who do not care who or where they are. In other words, place or the there of the poems is supposed to have no importance to the lyric voice. But taking his examples from Chaucer onwards through Shakespeare, the landscape poets of the eighteenth century, and Wordsworth, along with a number of prominent Canadian poets such as Elise Partridge and Newfoundlands Mary Dalton, Burt shows that the lyric poem often relies importantly upon an attachment to place and time. More significantly, he uncovers the fact that in lyric poetry the contemplation of place is one way in which the outside, what's shared, potentially public... can seem to meet the inside, the private or individual experience that we may consider ultimately unknowable (unless it is our own) and yet expect poetry to reproduce. Reading Burt, one comes to see lyric poetry from a wholly new perspective.
