

The Adventures of Caleb Williams: Or Things As They Are, Vol. 3 of 3 (Classic Reprint)

The face of the country, in the spot to which I had thus opened myself a passage, was rude and uncultivated. It was overgrown with brushwood and furze; the soil was for the most part of a loose sand; and the surface extremely irregular. I climbed a small eminence, and could perceive, not very remote in the distance, a few cottages thinly scattered. This prospect did not altogether please me; I conceived that my safety would, for the present, be extremely assisted, by keeping myself from the view of any human being. I therefore came down again into the valley, and upon a careful examination perceived that it was interspersed with cavities, some deeper than others, but all of them so shallow as neither to be capable of hiding a man nor of exciting suspicion in places of possible concealment. While the day had but just begun to dawn. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and do not occur in the book.)
