Excerpt from The Best of the Worlds Classics, Restricted to Prose, Vol. 4 of 10 Born In Ireland in 1672; died in Wales in 1729; companion of Addison at Oxford; served in the army in 1694, becoming a captain; elected to Parliament, but expelled for using seditious language; knighted under George; quarreled with Addison in 1719; founded the Tatler, and next to Addison, was the chief writer for the Spectator. I Of Companions and Flatterers An old acquaintance who met me this morning seemed overjoyed to see me, and told me I looked as well as he had known me do these forty years; but, continued he, not quite the man you were when we visited together at Lady Brightlys. Oh! Isaac, those days are over. Do you think there are any such line creatures now living as we then conversed with? He went on with a thousand incoherent circumstances, which, in his imagination, must needs please me; but they had the quite contrary effect. The flattery with which he began, in telling me how well I wore, was not disagreeable; but his indiscreet mention of a set of acquaintance we had outlived, recalled ten thousand things to my memory, which made me reflect upon my present condition with regret.
